New, air-conditioned, modernly equipped
R & D Laboratory at Amherst in suburban
Buffalo, New York. Opened March, 1958.

Doing Applied Research in Communications in a New Lab with a Company Growing Steadily on a Basis of Its Creative Contributions to Science and Engineering

The work of the Communications Research Staff is concentrated on the application of tomorrow's radically new theoretical concepts to communications theory and systems development.

Some of our equipment, already developed, for air-to-air communications is so tradition-breaking in technique that even our customers could not believe in its final capabilities.

Now our new expanded lab facilities permit operations to grow in a major way. If work in advanced communications research, under ideal conditions, is your career-aim, and you have an Advanced Degree in EE, Physics or Mathematics or the EQUIVALENT IN GRADUATE COURSE WORK, investigate these positions in Applied Research:

Novel Circuitry—This is a high level position requiring the ability to invent practical circuits to bring to fruition new, basic concepts in the field of communications. Ability eventually to form a 10-20 man circuits team desired. Candidate needs familiarity with transistor applications, digital computer design, and a variety of novel video-radio frequency circuits, modulation in unconventional dimensions.

Novel Communications Systems—Vision and creative ability of a high order are needed for this important assignment. Candidate must be able to derive and direct applications of new techniques developed in the Amherst Laboratory to existing and new communications systems. Man we seek should have a sound understanding of the field of military communications systems and a broad technical background.

- Also a few research positions open in the field of Probability & Information Theory and Electromagnetic Propagation. Work involves both experimental and theoretical research. Ph.D. required.
